

MOSQUITOES

When my father wanted to point out galaxies or Andromeda or the Seven Sisters, I'd complain of the huzz of mosquitoes, or of the yawning moon-quiet in that slow, summer air. All I wanted was to go inside into our cooled house and watch TV or paint my nails. What does a fifteen year-old girl know of patience? What did I know of the steady turn of whole moon valleys cresting into focus?

Standing there in our driveway with him, I smacked my legs, my arms, and my face while I waited for him to find whatever pinhole of light he wanted me to see. At night, when I washed my face, I'd find bursts of blood and dried bodies slapped into my skin. Complaints at breakfast about how I'd never do it again, how I have more homework now, Dad. How I can't go to school with bites all over my face anymore. Now I hardly ever say no. He has plans to go star-gazing with his grandson and for once, I don't protest.

He has plans. I know one day he won't ask me, won't be there to show me the rings of Saturn glowing gold through the eyepiece. He won't be there to show me how the moons of Jupiter jump if you catch them on a clear night. I know one day I will look up into the night sky searching, searching— I know the mosquitoes will still have their way with me—and my father won't hear me complain.

Aimee Nezhukumatathil
-from Lucky Fish (Tupelo 2011)